MYSTERY OF A MAD WOMAN Escaped From Bellevue and Caught on Madison Avenue in Night

Dress. New York, Nov. 8-There was no mystery about the young woman. She was there as plain as the day that was just breaking yesterday morning, and she was wild-eyed, barefooted and in her nightdress. Two young men caught her as she was running distractedly across Madison avenue at Twenty-fifth street.

"Let me go! let me go!" she shricked madly, tugging for freedom, "I want to go home! They put me in Bellevue! I'm not crazy! I want to go home! I live at 125 Fifth avenue. He's there

GIRL STRIKERS VIOLENT. Attack Employes of Gould's Factory Who Attempt to Go to Work.

New York, Nov.8.-The trouble among has not been settled. Yesterday five loyal ones reported for work at the fac- attack from the hunters, and, besides, tory as usual. But the 155 strikers were equally determined to prevent them. Immediately in the rear of the Continental match factory is a small grove. The striking matchmakers went into it and cut heavy branches from the trees. Then they waited around the factory corner for the arrival of the Gould loyalists. The five came up the road together. The strikers rushed on the lovalists and beat them with tree boughs until they took refuge, bruised and crying and frightened, in the fac-tory entrance. NO CHANCE FOR SEALS

NOTHING CAN SAVE THEM FROM THE AVARICE OF MAN.

Boundary Troubles Encourage British and Russian Ponchers and Guerrillas of All Nations-Work of Extermination. [Special Correspondence.]

VICTORIA, B. C., Nov. 5 .- There is renewed trouble over the seal fisheries on the Alaskan coast. In addition to the raids of Russian and English peachers and guerrillas of other nations, it is claimed that the boundaries are not straight, and a readjustment is asked. The poschers are more at fault than the boundary lines. There is almost always trouble in the Alaskan waters, and it will perhaps continue until the supply of seals is exhausted. When Alaska was purchased, it was estimated that there were about 3,000,000 seals in those waters. In leasing the privilege of seal hunting the government limited the yearly supply to be taken at 100,-000. Whether the corporation observed this limitation or not is not known. Charges have been made from time to time that it did not. The original corporation has, however, been succeeded by another. It was also stipulated that only males between the ages of 1 and 5 years might be killed so that the supply should not become exhausted. It was estimated that with this limitation the supply would last for many years-the a million marketable scals in the Alaskan waters. In addition the poachers take a great many, which was not figured on in the official estimate. True, the government endeavors to put a stop to this seal pirating, but the buccaneers generally manage to escape the revenue cutters. At this rate of decrease the supply will become exhausted in a very few years. Seals of the fur bearing species are not found elsewhere in this country, or, if found at all, they are in such limited fields as to be invaluable to commerce; hence the necessity of preserving the supply. Fur bearing seals are found in small numbers off the coast of California, but they are from the Alaskan rockeries-the animals merely being on a prospecting tour.

The seals prefer the Alaskan rookerman stepped forward.
"Mr. Bergdorf's ill and you can't see him." she snapped.
At the hospital little was known of this from experience with the Russians. fes because those islands are rugged, this from experience with the Russians, who had been hunting them for nearly a century before the United States bought the islands. The tradition was no doubt handed down, for the instinct of danger is as strong in animals as in human beings, perhaps. They roost in these rocky cliffs in droves numbering hundreds, constantly biting and fighting for position, as in the human world. Those that cannot get a foothold on the the striking girls in Edwin Gould's rookery have to content themselves with match factory, just outside of Passaic, a less preferred position out on the beach, where they are more liable to an the seal prefers a rocky foundation, where he can slide around with ease. When lying upon the beach, the hunter gets between the seal and the water and their capture is easy. The seal can walk, climb and run, after a fashion, as well as swim. At night they leave their rookeries and swim out into the shallow water. They soon roar and bellow themselves to sleep, and in the meantime the hunters, by a circuitous ronte, have placed the seals between themselves and the shore. Then they (the hunters) will begin to shout, hoot and fire pistols in the air. The seals are easily stampeded, and they at once make for the shore in the opposite direction from the noise. When they have waded out upon the beach, the seals are surrounded, and the hunters prod them into line and march them to the "killing grounds" near by. Here the hunters again use their steel prods and form the seals into line, as the Spaniards do their prisoners condemned to be shot. The seal executioner uses a sharp edged club, striking the animal on the back of the head, generally killing it with one blow. When the blow is not effective, the roar of the animal is pitiful, almost buman in tone, and one that would move almost any human being to sympathy-save the callous executioner. The blow is struck upon the head and a club used because a knife or bullet would impair the value of the skin. The small holes found in the skin where these animals have bit each other in their dis-

MANUSCRIPT ONLY.

She was a little, delicate, modest woman, to whom the world did nothing in particular until it treated her badly. And that happened when she had a grown up daughter and three sons at school and an invalid husband who could do nothing toward earning money that was needed. Then it was that she thought of writing a book. A friend who had dropped in one evening told a story of an acquaintance who had written a book in middle age and made a great deal of money. Then Mrs. Abbey remembered that when she was a girl, before her marriage, she had written two little stories and sent them to a provincial paper. They had been accepted and paid for, She said to her husband, "I wonder if I could write a book!"

He did not answer, for he thought she was not in earnest. But Mrs. Abbey thought of it constantly, until ideas began to crowd her brain. She said to herself:
"I do believe I could write a book. There is no harm in trying."

Is no harm in trying."

She got a packet of clumsy foolscap paper, and one night, when all the household was asleep, she lit a lamp and began to write. And the words came fluently, very fluently. Her daughter Gwendolya awoke, and, seeing the light, came to find out what her mother was doing, for these two women shared every hope and care. "'Mother," she cried, seeing the pile of paper, "what are you doing? Oh, mother, I do believe you are writing a book." At first Mrs. Abbey denied it from the same impulse that had made her put her hand quackly over the writing when her daughter came in. But after a time she confessed that it was so, and timidly read aloud the first chapter, which she had just finished.

"Oh, mother, it is beautiful," cried Gwendolyn, "Shall I go on with it, then?" "Yes, yes, go on with it. It's splendid.

I'm sure it will sell. Do go on with it." So she went on with it. And when several chapters had been written she said timidly to her husband and sons, who were home for the holidays: "I-I thought I might be able to write a story. I have put down a few ideas here, and I'd like to know if you think it worth going on

"I've read it," said Gwen, "and it's so

Mr. Abbey took the closely written pages of MS, and read them aloud. "It is fine! It is beautiful!" they cried. And it was beautiful. It was very beauti-

She went on writing. It was to be a real book—a great book, as long as one of Scott's or Dickens'—and, though her pen was so fluent, the writing took a long time. Besides, she had other work to dohousehold duties to tire her out during the day, and sometimes her head ached when evening came—but as soon as she took up the pen her cheeks grew flushed and her mind grew warm with hope. She lost sight of the bare surroundings and lived in the atmosphere which falls like a shimmering mist from heaven upon those who commit their souls to paper and write with their life's blood. She was not working for fame or glory or celebrity. She had no worldly ambition, but she worked for husband and children, for bread, for Every Sunday Mr. Abbey read aloud the chapters that had been written during the week, and they all cried, "It is beautiful!" The crush had left them sufficient money to live on for about 18 months. By that time the book would be finished, and the book must needs be a success, be cause it was written with all the best of a woman's soul. They were shy of men-tioning it to outsiders, but Mr. Abbey read part of it to a few intimate friends, and they admired it.

"I am glad of that," said Mr. Abbey in confidence to his daughter, rather mistrusted my own judgment, though the book seems to me very beauti-ful, but Mrs. Murray admired it immense-"And she ought to be a judge, said Gwen, "because she's a cousin of that Mr. Johnson, the journalist, and must know a lot of literary people." The book took nearly 18 months to write, and by that time the money was all used up. The last chapter had been finished and "the end" written with a flourish. The manuscript was large and bulky and very clos ly written They packed it up in brown paper and sent it off to a literary agent, as Mrs. Murray had advised them to do. As Mrs. Abbey handed it over the postoffice counter she felt as though it was her heart that she was sending forth made up into a brown paper parcel, sealed and registered and labeled "MS." only. About three weeks later the postman brought the letter for which they had been watching. The literary agent wished to see Mrs. Abbey the following day if she would come to his offices. He said nothing about the book, but there was an undefinable fra-grance of kindness about the businesslike little note, or so at least it seemed to them. Next day Mrs. Abbey started off with Gwen, both their hearts beating. They went in their best dresses. Mr. Linley was awaiting them. When he heard them coming up the stairs, he began to wish him-self 100 miles off. He had given the deathblow to many hopes in the course of his life, but he winced somewhat all the same. Perhaps he had the faculty of reading between the lines.

And Gwen and her mother sat quietly without a word, while he broke to Mrs Abbey as gently as he could the truth— that her great, bulky story hid a beautiful soul in a body hopelessly unlovely. It would be useless to offer it to any publisher, and even if anybody would take it it would never sell.

"I-am-sorry," said Mrs. Abbey, with dry lips. Gwen could not speak or look

Mr. Linley winced. Then he told her that be could put her in the way of doing another kind of literary work, where her fluency would be useful and where beau-tiful thoughts were not needed. Would she come back to see him this day week? Gwen and her mother walked away. They got into a dingy omnibus to save their best dresses from being spolled by the rain. They were quite silent for a long time.

"Never mind, Gwennie," said the mother at last, putting one cold hand up to her mouth. "I shall do something else. And he seemed-a-kind man,"-M. E. Finlay in Cincinnati Herald.
